"This isn't normal." Some students are worried, though. "I'm not going to say if it's going to become a general trend or not, but it's definitely a concern," said student Kimberly Roper. "If it becomes more common, then we'll have to worry about attacks, especially if they're directed against a certain group." She said that the school's administration has made a great effort to make students feel safe. "They are very close-knit, and they are always out here looking out for each other," Roper said. "I'm just happy to be here." St. Petersburg is home to the largest population of gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgender people in Florida, according to the Williams Institute, a UCLA School of Law think tank. A police report was taken at the school on Thursday, and no arrests were made, according to Zunino. He said that surveillance footage from the school was reviewed.
